A New York man whose sperm was used to impregnate more than two dozen women in surrogacy arrangements has been arrested and charged with raping some of those women, the authorities said on Tuesday. The Brooklyn District Attorney's office in New York charged the man, identified as F.S., with several counts of rape, and prosecutors said the complaints came from women who were also impregnated through artificial insemination. The charges marked the first time prosecutors have linked a surrogate mother, who delivers babies for donors and couples in IVF treatment, to sexual abuse. The case, stemming from DNA evidence, highlights the ambiguities surrounding the birth of children created through surrogacy arrangements, including whether the women involved are consenting adults.

Carcass-based monitoring of the calorific value of pig and broiler meat. In this study, 5 pigs and 5 broilers, aged 31-42 kg and 39-42 days, respectively, were used. Each carcass was divided into 1 for control and 4 for treatment (single, 2nd cut, 3rd cut and 4th cut). To monitor energy metabolism, the carcasses were used to measure the heat production. The highest specific energy (kJ kg⁻¹) was found in the 4th cut. The calorific value per carcass (kg) was greater in broilers than in pigs, whereas specific energy was lower in pigs. The broilers' energy metabolism during the first and second cuts was higher than during the 3rd and 4th cuts.
